We don't need to know the venue

-and also we don't need to operate on Oahu only. I understand where you're coming from, but the goal is to pursue opportunities on the mainland as well, and we would like to give the impression that we could handle a wedding anywhere, which is truly the case.

we don't need a guest count either, these things change depending on circumstances surrounding how the process goes.

All we need to know is inspo and maybe budget (but honestly just need to know you want to get married and where)

- the goal is to limit the amount of workload for the client. By the time a potential client gets to our website, they want to be done with all the bullshit. at the end of the day, the venue is just another vendor and couples explore multiple options, we want to facilitate that and take care of it.
- The main selling point of event planning in general is to limit stress and personal workload, we want to make our service kind of like a one stop shop, in a sense.
